

— Berlin Marathon: World Record For Kipsang —

by Sean Hartnett

Berlin, Germany; September 29—
The 40th BMW Berlin Marathon began with a celebration of the 7 runners who had previously achieved World Records over the city's über-quick route.

Wilson Kipsang joined this illustrious club as the lanky Kenyan hit autobahn speed over the final 2.2 kilometers to drop the all-time best to a stunning 2:03:23. (Technically, Geoffrey Mutai is the "fastest" ever with his aided-course 2:03:02 from Boston '11).

"I am feeling very happy as the World Record holder in the marathon," Kipsang admitted. "I'm the man now."

With this win and record, the 31-year-old Kipsang also became the first to run under 2:04 twice as he now possesses the event's Nos. 1 & 3 clockings, bracketing Patrick Makau's vanquished record of 2:03:38.

Runner-up Eliud Kipchoge (2:04:05) also jumped high in the all-time rankings as his second marathon effort moved him to No. 4 ever, with the No. 5 performance. And he became the fastest non-winner ever.

The record chase was on from the start, as would be expected, with former recordsetter Haile Gebrselassie pulling the gun's trigger.

Dashing off into the still cool air the lead pack blasted a 2:47 opening kilometer before settling into a crisp tempo over a 61:34 opening half (see p. 563 for a complete charting of Kipsang's kilos).

"We really sailed through that first kilometer," Kipsang recalled, "but I was really feeling comfortable. My target was to run under 61:45 and when we crossed at the half I saw that we a little faster. I was feeling good and thought, 'The World Record is possible because I was still feeling strong and feeling I can still make a move.'"

Kipsang's only difficulty came as a bit of wind popped up and the pace slowed through 30K with his 1:28:01 split netting a 2:03:48 pace.

Recalling that stretch, Kipsang said, "The course was really nice but at some points we felt a headwind and the pace would automatically drop. When I saw that the pace was slowing down away from the record and I had to correct it immediately."

Upping the tempo with a 14:35 segment, Kipsang passed 35K in 1:42:36, down to 2:03:41 pace. That acceleration pared the race to three with fellow Kipchoge and Geoffrey Kipsang still in attendance.

Not for long: Wilson threw down a 2:50

kilo to drop his compatriots and secure the win. "That was part of my tactic, he admitted. "I knew that pace was really high and I made a move to see how strong they are. Whenever they tried to close the gap, I would be ready to make the next move."

Heading towards 40K, Kipsang could now focus on securing the record.

"Crossing the 40-kilometer mark I saw that the pace was exactly the World Record pace, 2:03:38. Then I knew that the remaining 2.2 distance could really save me so I decide to make the final move to the finish and I really made it."

Hitting the accelerator, Kipsang pumped his arms in a vigorous stride, zipping the final 2195 meters in just 6:11 (2:49 kilo pace) to close out his run for history.

"I tried to control the psychological part," he said. "I was very tired but I knew I could still do it. I knew I still had enough energy and let me try to move and go deeper to see what are the possibilities. I knew I was so close that I had to push it harder."

Kipsang became the third Kenyan to hold the marathon standard, joining Makau and Paul Tergat. "When I saw Paul Tergat break the record in 2003 I was still young and an amateur and he really inspired me," said Kipsang. "I was thinking, 'Maybe one time I will be a World Record holder,' and that time has arrived."

Overall, it wasn't a deep race, with only a half-dozen breaking 2:10. Similarly, the women's race saw just 5 cracking 2:30, topped by the 2:21:13 of Florence Kiplagat, scoring an easy win over fellow Kenyan Sharon Cherop (2:22:28).

In 5th, Desiree Davila ran the fastest legal-course U.S. time of the year, 2:29:15.
